It's not just you lot - the whole 'kin world's against me !

Got home to find all the Christmas shite in the living room and the conservatory full of lights :(

The legal budgie reports that the tree is now vertical and covered with crap !

It's NOT feckin Christmas yet you I love maggots on toast !

:cool:

We got the Merc as a runaround to do the short trips as the diesel Jag has the dreaded DPF valves - why would we want another diesel ?

Posted by: meooo
Date: 08-12-2014 22:39:39

Because Merc diesels are way behind with tractor technology (that's what dpf systems were designed for) And they aren't valves by the way, they're combustion chambers in the exhaust system, taking excess fuel in whilst you drive and burning the soot off, this produces ash, which blocks the chamber(filter) and leads to replacements @ stupidly low mileages and the fuel washes past the piston rings, diluting engine oil and causing bore wear. So they last longer too and pull better. The taking of excess fuel is also worked out by the ecu, which makes a calculation each time the engine is started, this is why short trips or stop/start running isn't good for them, so the service light comes on to tell you to change the engine oil between service intervals.....
Just sayin ...
