I'm typing this slightly peeved, because the pain killers are wearing off, and I can't take the next load until bed time. Thankfully I'm back on day shifts tomorrow so with the alarm set for 03:30, bed time will be about 21:00.

Thankfully mine is not a serious issue, in fact it could be considered trivial, I'm just not enjoying it much.

Christmas day I broke the front off a wisdom tooth. Didn't really think much of it at the time, I was working shifts, had a headache, and feeling tired. Got to the rest days Monday morning and realised that the headache wasn't a headache it was toothache, and needed sorting. Well I haven't seen a dentist since leaving school over 2 decades ago, so I've had the joys of ringing around for NHS taking new patients. Which I have managed but my appointment is not until the 6th, and that's to check my teeth, so I'm not expecting them to work on them!

To make matters worse I've just counted my painkillers and I've only got 2 days worth left, so there needs to be a shopping trip as well!

The thing I can't understand is why isn't the damaged tooth hurting? It's either my right eye, my lower jaw, or the right side of my head. It's the top right wisdom tooth. Also why can't my tongue stay away from it?

Right I'm going to slink off somewhere and feel grumpier than usual now.

Probably a bit late now, but down this way the local hospitals have dentists on hand for those of us who don't have a regular dentist.

Can usually get a next day appointment (was never possible with the group I was with) and the service is far better. As for the pain, you may well find it's got infection in the gum ..... And they'll need to treat that before removing the tooth :(:
Good luck

I reckon he knew about the hospital, he's just enjoying the pain and faux sympathy...

One of those weird nerve things. Teeth are buggers for creating phantom pain in other areas.

Back next Wednesday for one extraction (wisdom tooth) & one filling. Not bad considering I haven't seen a dentist for 23 years.

Damn, I wish I could get away with that one :)

Went to dentist yesterday and now need a new wing and paint job on the wife's car :/

Apparently it was a sitting target in the car park and some bugger couldn't miss it :cry1:

Shit, bugger, bollocks, shit.

The practises x ray didn't work on me, so I have to be referred to a hospital x ray machine. Then return for the extraction. So still on the pain killers.

Still waiting for the referral letter for a hospital to do the X Ray. Only minor issue there is I have a phobia of hospitals, and do not set foot over their threshold.

Pain wise, it's quite weird. I can go a whole day without any problems (need them to sleep though), or I can be watching the clock to see when I'm allowed my next dose.

Hmmm - I've only been in hospital 3 times, 4 weeks when I was 17 (3 or 4 lumbar punctures), 2 weeks when I was 28 (Liver biopsy) and last month (angiogram and quad bypass). I'm pretty much used to them already BUT I still don't like needles :cool:

Not too sure at the moment. Feeling a little battered as it had a curved root and took some persuading to remove. Oh and it took 3 injections to numb to area before the extraction.
